NULLARBOR ROADHOUSE

SOUTH AUSTRALIA

To understand the rich history of the Nullarbor, you first need to understand how it earned its name. Back in 1866, surveyor E. Alfred Delisser was working on the Nullarbor Plain and took note of the significant lack of trees existing in the area. He is credited with creating the name Nullarbor, which is Latin for “no trees”. Do not let this name deceive you though; barring a few baron areas, there are many different species of trees and other local fauna spread across the Plain. Prior to 1956, the site was home to Nullarbor Station and covered 1.25 million acres (that’s x2.7 larger than Singapore!). There were paddocks of sheep, horses and cattle, along with some wild wombats and dingoes. In 1956, then station manager Elwyn, or “Scoe”, as he was affectionately known, decided to sell petroleum to generate additional revenue. The petrol would be hand pumped out of the drums into gallon tanks and sold to locals and visitors passing through. A small shop was also established in an old stone building. Its products were more traditional than what you’re likely to see in stores these days – tea, canned food, biscuits, lollies and cordial drinks made up day to day sales.

The shop’s popularity continued to grow as the number of travellers passing through the area increased over time. By 1976, upon completion of the Eyre Highway, the Nullarbor Roadhouse building was built and the business was formally established. That same building exists on the property today. The roadhouse has become a popular stopover for most travellers in part due to its isolation. It is approximately 300 km west of Ceduna, and 200 km east of the South Australian / West Australian border. Our isolation and unique location means there is nowhere else in the world like the Nullarbor.

We are proud to be the owners and caretakers of a part of Australian history and we look forward to sharing it with you as you make your way across the Eyre Highway.
